Subject: Kensington

Governor,

Sunny just mentioned your request to remove the Kensington trip from the schedule. I knew that you would be concerned about the number of days in Juneau so I thought of a solution. The Weekly Standard folks, after the lunch on the 18th, are going on a trip to Kensington and then up to the icefield. I was thinking that we could move our trip from the 19th to the 18th, have lunch, attend the Kensington mine tour with the Weekly Standard staff (which could be a very good trip for you to talk about the significance and concern with the 9th circuit decision) and then split apart and we would continue with our Juneau access tour. We could accomplish what was two days of events in one. You could head back to Anchorage that night or the next day, giving you an extra day to get out in the public. Please let me know if you would still like to cancel or if the suggested itinerary sounds like a possibility. Thank you.

Mike

Orphaned Moose Calves – May 25, 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Dear Commissioner Lloyd:

In a recent Anchorage Daily News front page article (May 26, 2007)(see attached), Tyonek Native Corporation learned that two moose calves were orphaned after an unfortunate incident involving a cow moose and an 8 year old child in Anchorage.

Under the Freedom of Information Act, we request a copy of the official report from the Alaska Department of Fish and Game (ADF&G) on the disposal of those calves after the incident.

According to the ADN story, the incident happened on Friday, May 25, 2007 in South Anchorage near Kendall Loop and 84th Avenue. The Fish and Game representative was Rick Sinnott.

In prior years it has been reported to us that the majority of the calves orphaned on the road system were considered "nuisance" moose and there were no facilities to care for them. As a result the majority of those calves were euthanized by ADF&G or by Alaska Department of Public Safety (ADPS) at the direction of ADF&G.

Over the last 15 years Alaska has lost more than 50% of its moose population; or more than any other place on the planet. As a result of this population loss, Alaska has lost its status as a premier wildlife resource state. In fact, as of 2001, 48 other States now harvest 100% to 1,000% more hoofed wildlife per acre than does Alaska, as noted in research completed by Alaska Village Initiatives in 2005.

As such Alaska can no longer afford to euthanize orphaned calves and, thanks to the Alaska Moose Federation and its network of participating groups, we can provide alternatives to euthanasia. The Alaska Moose Federation and its partners, including the Anchorage Zoo, can offer professionally managed facilities and resources including care by licensed veterinarians. Those calves will be cared for in secure sites until the calves can be released safely into prepared habitats in the wild each fall.

TNC requests your support in this effort in two ways.

1. By publicly disclosing information on all orphaned moose calves (including the two involved in the May 25, 2007 incident in Anchorage, and

2. By fully complying with the proposed moose calf rescue program recently approved by Governor Palin.

TNC stands ready to support this program to achieve the restoration of Alaska's moose population for the benefit of all Alaskans.

Thank you for your consideration for this important issue. If you have any questions, please contact me at (907) 272-0707. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Tom Harris
Chief Executive Officer

Cow moose shot after kicking 8-year-old to protect calves

Trying to protect calves, moose targets 8-year-old, then gets shot

An Anchorage police officer shot and killed a cow moose that was trying to trample an 8-year-old boy in South Anchorage Friday morning. The shooting orphaned the moose's newly born twins.

Police and wildlife officials say the moose likely was protecting its calves when it kicked the boy, causing minor injuries, before police put it down.

The child, the moose and the moose's two newborns were cornered between homes with no easy way out, said Anchorage area Fish and Game biologist Rick Sinnott. "It was a like a closet back there," Sinnott said. "There was no way the police officer could do anything but shoot the moose."

The boy, his playmates and other children in the neighborhood of dense single-family homes, it seems, did nothing to provoke the moose other than being in the wrong place at the wrong time, police said.

The moose likely gave birth to the twins within the past week and probably at or near where the incident occurred on Kendall Loop near 84th Avenue and Spruce Street, Sinnott said.

The boy was outside playing between houses in the mid-morning when the moose appeared and charged, police spokesman Lt. Paul Honeman said. The boy's friends were able to get away, but the boy stumbled and fell. He rolled on the ground, ending up against a fence, and protected his head with his arms, while the moose began kicking with her front legs.

Anthony Oder, 15, was playing basketball nearby with friends on his first day of summer vacation when he heard a faint cry from somewhere behind the houses. "I thought it was a dog whining," he said.

The Service High teenager followed the sound and found the moose on the other side of a backyard fence threatening the 8-year-old. He called 911.

The moose was trapped because she had to pass the boy to leave the yard, but she would not do that with her calves, Sinnott said.

Oder and his friends shook the fence and threw rocks at the moose to distract her. She backed off briefly and made a move toward them, then went back to the boy, Oder said.

The police officer was on the scene within minutes. He shot the mother moose with a long gun, likely a shotgun, Honeman said.

Oder said two shots put her down.

The male and female calves were put into large dog kennels and taken away by Fish and Game. Sinnott said they will likely be going to conservation or research facilities. The cow will be donated to a charity for its meat.

Sinnott said the end of May and beginning of June are the most dangerous time of year in Anchorage for moose encounters. Mother moose protecting their new young and children just out of school and playing outside can be a hazardous mix, he said.

Oder said after the shooting the two baby moose kept on frolicking in the bright green grass, seemingly unaffected by the death of their mother.

Daily News reporter Megan Holland can be reached at mrholland@adn.com.

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- State biologists said this is the worst time of year for moose encounters because females are giving birth and kids are out of school.

One young boy learned that the hard way today when he was attacked by a mother moose.

Residents of a South Anchorage neighborhood said they've seen the female moose around for months, but this was the first time they've seen her with her twin calves.

The calves, which are less than a week old, are now orphaned. The mother was shot by police after it charged Joseph Kihlstadius, 8, while he walked through the neighborhood.

"We were just walking on that trail and then just hid and then we were gonna go over here, but then I slipped and then the moose trampled me and then trampled me again," Kihlstadius said.

Kihlstadius said he tried to protect himself by curling up near a fence, but the moose kept coming. Anthony Oder and his friends were playing basketball nearby when they heard a commotion coming from the backyard.

"We thought it was like a puppy, we heard like some squealing, so we went through my back window and we saw a little kid huddled against our fence," Oder said.

Anthony and his friends tried to pull Kihlstadius out of harm's way by reaching over top of the fence, but when they tried to grab him the moose turned her attention on them.

"We wanted to get the kid out of there really bad, because he was really little and we didn't really know what to do," Oder said.

There was nothing they could do but wait for police.

When officers arrived, the moose was still ready to charge, so they made the decision to shoot her.

Alaska Department of Fish and Game Biologist Rick Sinnott said moose should be avoided this time of year.

"This is the worst time of year for moose because they're having their calves, and they've very defensive - the cows are very defensive with their calves," Sinnott said.

Paramedics treated Kihlstadius for scrapes and bruises before sending him on his way with his very grateful father. Jeremy Kihlstadius said he was just happy his boy was OK.

Sinnott said this is definitely the worst moose run-in he's seen this year. But he said it isn't the first and it won't be the last.

"The calves don't move very much the first week or so and they have them in people's backyards in the greenbelts and stuff like that. The kids are out of school, moose are having babies -- it's the absolute worst time of year to have kids and moose mixing it up," Sinnott said.

Sinnott said he'll determine the sex of the orphaned calves before sending them on to a sanctuary or preserve. The mother moose has been butchered and her meat will be given to local charities and homeless shelters.

Sinnott said the best thing to do if you run into an aggressive moose is run, but to remember that applies to moose only and not bears or any other animal. If you fall down or can't get away, Sinnott recommends covering your head and trying not to move. He said moose would rather get away with their calves than attack.
